Building High-Performance Insurance Leadership Teams

---

Jay D'Aprile

EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT

Effective executives must demonstrate collaborative strengths to contribute to an organization's continuous adaptivity and growth.

The insurance industry, once a secure backbone of the economy, has faced significant destabilization in recent years. Shocked by natural disasters and inflationary costs, providers are implementing rate hikes of their own for temporary relief from massive financial losses. However, as future risks grow more unpredictable, organizations must undergo large-scale transformation to maintain their competitive advantage and thrive.

Effective insurance leadership teams are catalysts for strategic change. When executives go beyond steering their businesses through turbulent times—establishing the expertise, agility, and alignment required for long-term growth—organizational resilience ensues.

Hallmarks of Exceptional Insurance Leadership Teams

In our previous examination of the traits of modern insurance leaders, we had identified the growing demand for executives with omnichannel prowess, niche expertise, and strong accountability. These characteristics remain critical for individual performance—but an exceptional insurance organization depends on the interconnected performance of the entire C-suite team.

Executives must excel in active collaboration to drive organization-wide change. A recent study found a strong correlation between companies that outperform their competition and teams that display alignment, trust, and proactive execution. This demands a collective vision and shared goals.

While insurance leaders have traditionally remained hyper-focused on their respective domains—for example, with CFOs leading financial audits and accounting activities—all executives are increasingly participating in business strategy. This could expose the C-suite to the challenge of mismatched agendas, which can bring productivity to a halt. However, clearly defined objectives provide a shared framework for decision-making—elevating accountability while empowering executives to align their priorities.

Top-performing insurance leadership teams are not homogenous by any means. In fact, they calibrate despite their often-considerable differences. Progressive, for example, boasts the highest gender diversity score in its sector yet now stands as one of the fastest-growing P&C insurers in terms of net premiums written. The best executive teams simply leverage diverse perspectives to drive creativity—with an explicitly communicated direction in mind.

Key Strategies for Building Effective Leadership Teams

Building an impactful leadership team starts at the recruitment stage. Evaluating personal accomplishments certainly hasn't lost its importance—but outstanding metrics can often be achieved through a headstrong approach that weakens executive collaboration. Increasingly, hiring teams must consider interpersonal communication skills in their search.

Deloitte reports executives who demonstrate social sensitivity and speak in turns, rather than dominating the conversation, contribute to higher collective intelligence. Interestingly, the study showed gender diversity also strengthens team communication—not only because women scored higher in sensitivity, but because female representation elevated social bonding, which is conducive to information-sharing.

Insurance companies can effectively broaden their talent pools by outsourcing recruitment. Executive search firms offer connections to a wide range of top talent—including both passive and active candidates—ensuring optimal skills matches, representative candidates, and excellent culture fits. However, insurers must also focus on strengthening their internal diversity, equity, and inclusion (DEI) initiatives to attract and build high-potential leaders. For example, Chubb invests in the continuous development of its diverse leadership team through mentorship and training opportunities for women.

Of course, effective collaboration cannot be established through social intelligence or demographics alone. Insurance firms must actively foster a culture that sparks both mutual respect and innovation—for instance, by establishing clear decision-making processes that give weight to domain expertise while encouraging contribution from all team members.

Maintaining High-Performing Insurance Leadership

Succeeding in the dynamic insurance landscape requires considerable adaptability. Leadership teams that effectively rise to today's challenges are not guaranteed to succeed when new risks come into play—but continuous learning can keep senior leaders responsive to market shifts in the long term. For example, State Farm partners with the Information Technology Senior Management Forum (ITSMF) to sharpen the competencies of established senior leaders.

Regular performance evaluations can further strengthen insurance leadership performance over time. By keeping executives accountable for departmental goals and organizational initiatives, insurance firms can drive execution while identifying key areas for both individual and collective growth. Constructive feedback mechanisms can similarly equip executives with a 360-degree review of their strengths and weaknesses, preventing incurable performance setbacks.

C-suite resiliency also depends on effective succession planning. While current executives may be committed to their growth, organizations must be prepared for the day they inevitably step down. Harvard Business Review reports poorly managed C-suite transitioned cost S&P 1500 companies nearly $1 trillion per year in market value—which insurers certainly can't afford in the growingly high-risk landscape. Maintaining strong performance requires companies to identify and develop future leaders long before turnover occurs.
